Spokesman of the Sudanese Armed Forces, Brigadier General Nabil Abdullah:

The Guardian's report (later deleted) is misleading, lacks transparency, and is a desperate attempt to tarnish the image of the Sudanese army.

July 23, 2024

Brigadier General Nabil Abdullah, the official spokesperson for the Sudanese Armed Forces, described the report published by the British newspaper The Guardian on its website, attributing specific behaviors to soldiers of the armed forces, as "completely lacking in transparency and impartiality, and a desperate attempt to tarnish the reputation of the Sudanese Armed Forces, which the Sudanese people have always known as loyal to their citizens and protectors of their honor, land, and dignity."

Brigadier General Nabil stated that the newspaper did not adhere to any professional standards ensuring the transparency and balance of its report and appears to have hidden motives.

He added that the report published by The Guardian on its official website contained blatant falsehoods and lies against members of the armed forces in Omdurman.

He pointed out that the newspaper's correspondent completely avoided contacting any members of the armed forces to present what she claimed to have obtained from the stories of women who alleged abuses. Furthermore, the correspondent did not request an official permit from the authorities to work in the area, raising further doubts about the report's motives and indicating that the journalist's mission might be to serve an agenda aimed at deliberately and diligently tarnishing the image of the Sudanese Armed Forces.

Brigadier General Nabil concluded his statement by asserting that the definitive proof to refute such fabricated accusations is that ordinary citizens flee any area entered by the terr_orist Rapid Support militia (Janjaweed) and seek refuge in areas where the armed forces are present because they feel safe for their lives, properties, and honor.

#RapidSupportMilitiaTerror

#RapidSupportIsTerroristMilitia

#OneArmyOneNation

#BattleOfDignity